But unfortunately, the only way a cunning agent can get close to the worm's creator, Tom Fuller, is to access the Orange County home of a programmer like the new Fuller nanny and his wife Leah's children: toddler Andrew and his two older sisters, Carrie and Molly. This means that Malcolm must once again rely on his faithful fire alter ego, take-no-prisoners Hattie Mae Pierce, a.s.a. Big Mom to knock down the bad guys and prove that a woman's job is never done! But once undercover, the job proves another tough juggling act for Big Momma, as it has to manage the hectic lives of Three Fuller's children, keep up with their myriad daily activities, and handle many household chores, all the while secretly trying to dig up information about Tom's computer virus. Of course, Malcolm's most difficult and comical task is to stay in the character of Big Momma in everything that requires the most complex physical and vocal transformations, not to mention the ability to think very quickly at their pumps. Hilarious situations tread on Big Mom trying to catch her booty, including penetrating a chic women's spa day, leading a raunchy teen cheerleading competition, and surviving a crazy water ski chase, all trying to keep her wig straight and skirts smooth. Along the way, Big Mom also helps bring the broken Fuller clan back together and in turn, Malcolm develops a newfound appreciation for his own family that includes steven with Trent and future pregnant wife Sherry. Malcolm also learns that he can find a successful balance work and household responsibilities without changing either side of the process.
